Oysters dying as coast is hit hard

A Washington family opens a hatchery in Hawaii to escape lethal waters.

H ILO, Hawaii — It appears at the end of a palm-tree-lined drive, not far from piles of hardened black lava: the newest addition to the Northwest's famed oyster industry.

Half an ocean from Seattle, on a green patch of island below a tropical volcano, a Washington state oyster family built a 20,000-square-foot shellfish hatchery.
